esite makes up a very small part of the overall depth, 1.5 arcseconds of the image at 150 nm) I will be writing about this soon in an extensive fashion - I would really like to see Jupiter's radial spokes, but there it the resolution and pw/fw/ifw issues still hold you back. That won't be solved for 18 months or more, so Jupiter has to wait. ? In Summary (the shorter version) New: Saturn's rings have sharp boundaries and not diffuse blobs of pixels They do have compact structure both inside the rings and within the gaps between the bright shadows. A sub-image patch from one of the data cubes that shows a section of the image: New: Saturn's E ring looks like it has sharp pixels and boundaries but some kind of blurring and shaping by the instrument is creating the boundaries. The E ring is much more clearly defined than Jupiter, indicating there may be more structure in Saturn's rings than Jupiter. Thus, from the resolution matches that of the other resolved features, the E ring must have radial spokes with clear boundaries like Jupiter's spokes do, and boundaries that are not set by the frozen coherent surface at Jupiter's neck (the very obvious inner shadow at the top of the A ring) Saturn's F ring is much smaller and close to Saturn than Jupiter's F ring is to the Sun. Saturn's F ring extends from about the same latitude as Saturn's A ring. Since the Saturn is tilted 14 degrees, Saturn's F ring has a very different appearance as seen in Perspective views. Saturn's C ring is arguably more akin to Jupiter's G ring than Saturn's A ring. C ring is located at Saturn's south pole, between Saturn and the Sun. Thus, the structure of C ring would strongly reflect sunlight reflected from the bodies around Saturn.
