Differential accumulation of chemical classes in potato tubers as associated with late blight severity and resistance to B. cinerea. The abundance of primary metabolites from diverse classes (amino acids, organic acids, organic nitrogen, inositol) was studied in a biphasic cultivar (Recalcitrant V286) of potato (Solanum tuberosum, L. Tuberosum) and contrasting either susceptible V286 mutants (V286 M1 and V286 T1), tolerant V286 mutants (V286 T2 and V286 T4) or a non-transformed control (V286 C). Initially (after stages E-CL), sugars increased steadily in total carbohydrate content and an unknown compound (particularly detected in the resistant phenotype) accumulated and this contributed to a slower growth in comparison to the susceptible cultivar. In later stages (II-VI) the susceptible cultivar V286 showed a decrease in carbohydrate content, which was consistent with the time-course expression of virulent phenotypes of B. cinerea. The concentrations of certain amino acids and organic and inositol nitrogen increased in the susceptible cultivar, as did the invertase activity, which could be correlated with the infection response of V286 to B. cinerea.
