TextEfficacy of probiotic therapy in reducing insulin resistance and its effect on inflammatory and oxidative stress markers in diabetic patients. This clinical trial evaluated the effects of one-month probiotic therapy on the level of insulin resistance and some associated inflammatory and oxidative stress markers in diabetic patients. This clinical trial was carried out on the patients with type 2 diabetes in Zabol, Iran. Twenty-three diabetic patients were chosen randomly and randomly allocated to either probiotic group or control group. The probiotic group consumed two capsules of Lactobacillus casei (Synbiotic C-Lactis) daily for one month while the control group consumed a placebo capsule in the same regimen. At the end of the study, the level of insulin resistance was determined through the homeostasis model assessment index (HOMA). Furthermore, samples were taken to determine the level of insulin, leptin, hs-CRP and homocysteine, and the level of oxidative stress was measured by the determination of malondialdehyde (MDA) levels. The results showed that insulin resistance significantly decreased following probiotic therapy ( $p = 0.03$ ). In addition, the level of insulin and MDA significantly decreased ( $p = 0.02$  and  $0.04$  respectively) and homocysteine significantly increased ( $p = 0.003$ ) following probiotic therapy. There was no change in the level of leptin and hs-CRP. It seems that probiotic therapy is an effective and inexpensive therapeutic strategy for the treatment of insulin resistance in diabetic patients.
