Deposition of novel crystalline films on oxide surfaces has been investigated using temperature-programmed desorption and scanning electron microscopy techniques. Soft crystalline materials are used to fabricate microporous, single-crystalline films on a SiO₂ surface after tuning the reaction temperature during the fabrication process. The molecular structure and thermal properties of these films have been examined in detail. During the synthesis process, the film is mainly decomposed to form isolated molecules from the initial dimethyl sulfoxide-on-ZnO monolayer, while subsequent annealing generates microcrystalline structures with increasing surface roughness, which directly affect the final film properties. The μ - and nanocrystals within the films show hexagonal and cubic lattice structures, depending on the deposition temperature. Lina finds a new meaning to the word love when
