If you are searching for a crack of the best Image (TIFF, JPEG,.Q: Unique id for each instance of a web page I'd like to store different levels of information about different webpages. These are the types of information I have : the url creation date the most recent update date I thought of having a database record for each webpage containing this information. To handle user updates, I thought I could automatically store in the database the level the webpage is updated to (from 1 to 5) and the updated date of the user. I'm quite new to database, so I can't decide if this is a good idea or not.

What do you think? I wouldn't want to do this for each database record, since I don't really want to store all the creation dates and most recent update dates of all the webpages. A: If you want to keep track of user updates on a webpage, why not just include a user ID in the URL? For example: Where user is an ID for some user of the site. If you need to keep track of changes made to the webpage then have a table that has a timestamp and a table for the changes themselves. So you would have something like: CREATE TABLE IF NOT EXISTS pages ( page_id INT UNSIGNED NOT NULL AUTO_INCREMENT, ... ); CREATE TABLE IF NOT EXISTS page_changes ( id INT UNSIGNED NOT NULL AUTO_INCREMENT, page_id INT UNSIGNED NOT NULL, ... last_updated_at TIMESTAMP NOT NULL DEFAULT CURRENT_TIMESTAMP, PRIMARY KEY (id), INDEX (page_id, last_updated_at) ); To insert a change record for a particular page: INSERT INTO page_changes (page_id, last_updated_at

In response to a question about the decision to dispatch helicopters, Moiseev. from Moscow and earned his PhD in preservation of cultural heritage. My girlfriend is an assistant editor in New York for '60 Minutes'. Last night when we were running late I missed the show and had to wait 45 minutes before it was available, so I called and they gave me the clearance code. When I got home I fired up the set, hit the cable and found the music channel where all the clips were playing. It was her! A couple months ago I went to the local indy game store and asked about getting an Xbox. The guy behind the counter said he didn't sell Xbox's. I asked him if he had a PS2. He shrugged and said "I don't buy them. You don't need them". He was like "You play games on your PC." Then he went off on a rant about how people get them to play movies, they aren't really for games. He's right. I have some friends that "DO" play a game (Mario 64) and they look at me like I'm a freak when I start talking about consoles. But I'm not really a gamer per se...I just want to put my mind in other places for a bit. I've never played a game on a console. So I guess I'm not really qualified to make a statement on the subject. Unless it were that I did want to play games, I don't think I would buy one. It's not like the gaming community has been pressuring anyone to buy a console. (Although they might have been trying to sell me a console, if only to make a statement.) I'm a console gamer, but I don't own one, and don't plan on getting one. My wife insists on gaming on the PC. I can't understand it, and I don't enjoy it. It seems like just mindless clicking of buttons that have no real
